Excerpt: . . . of life are continued, but in a faint and shadowy degree; the dead do not know what posses on earth, but are curious to learn it, and are mildly affected by the troubles of descendants or friends. Only the memory of what went before their own decease, the glories they had won, and the indignities they hod suffered, seems to live on in them. In both plays much urgency is used, as though it were desired to make the tale of present woes reach the ears of a careless listener, penetrating that obstruction of death which the dull covering of earth laid upon their bodies figures to the senses. Hence the prayers of Orestes and Electra are spoken of as a double scourge by means of which they ply, with gradually increasing effect, the very tomb where Agamemnon lies; hence the iteration of Darius...
