The printing given to the transparency should be at least three times that required for a print to be viewed by reflected light--under-exposure being the most general mistake. Tissue not too newly sensitised, full printing and prolonged development in hot water are the conditions most favorable to successful results. The exposed tissue is mounted in cold water on the coated glass, squeegeed, allowed to remain at least a quarter of an hour, then developed in hot water as any other carbon print, rinsed in cold water and soaked in 5 per cent, alum solution for a while to get rid of the bichromate, as although there is no paper base to show the stain, the gelatine picture holds enough bichromate to deteriorate the color of the pigment employed if left in the film; a final rinse, and the transparency, when dry, is finished. When intended for window decoration a ground glass backing is necessary. In printing transparencies, clouds could of course be printed in, but no one would be likely to do so, it being far easier to print the clouds separately and use them as a cover-glass holding the two transparencies film to film. This enables a cloud negative, lighted, say, from the left, to be used with a landscape lighted from the right; when the two negatives to be employed are both lighted from the same direction, one of the transparencies must be made by double transfer, thus correcting...
